
AN INDEX OF THE INQUISITION: 1546 – 1575

Carmel Cassar

THE Bull Licet ab initio, issued on 21 July 1542 by Pope Paul III, created a totally reformed Inquisition. It was clearly inspired by the recent success of the Spanish Inquisition, which in turn had been set up to suit the particular needs of the new and growing nation-empire that was Spain.

This new Tribunal, more commonly known as the Holy Office, was mainly intended to oppose the doctrines of Luther and the other flourishing Protestant sects. The Holy Supreme Congregation, under Cardinal Giovanni Pietro Caraffa (later Pope Paul IV), gained among its many privileges that of creating Inquisitors who were to be given the appropriate number of staff to help them in any town, province, or place. The first attempt was also made to compile an Index of prohibited books deemed likely to propagate false teachings.¹

The memoirs of Mgr. Salviati, himself Inquisitor of Malta (1754 – 59), complement the local Inquisition Archives and throw light on the establishment of this new Tribunal in Malta. Salviati relates how before 1530 there existed a tribunal of the old Medieval Inquisition, under the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Palermo, and which was no different from that of other Sicilian towns.² When the Bull was published (1542), Malta had been ruled by the Order of St John for only twelve years and the Tribunal was itself still in a period of transition. A few months later Domenico Cubelles was elected Bishop of Malta, a position he held until 1566.

The years of Cubelles' bishopric can be divided into two: the first, 1542 – 1561, when he functioned solely as Bishop of Malta; and the second, 1562 – 1566, when he also carried out the duties of Pro-Inquisitor to the Maltese Islands. Hence, prior to 1562, the Bishop could deal with cases against heresy through his own episcopal court so that the Camera Secreta and its appropriate staff did not need to exist.

Bishop Cubelles and heresy: 1546 – 61

The first group of 'heretics' dealt with by the Bishop included mainly members of notable families and some knights and foreigners. They were mainly accused of heresy, especially of sympathizing with Lutheran ideas. These were brought in front of the Bishop in April 1546 and Cubelles compiled a voluminous case against 28 individuals.³ No action was taken against them as they all gave orthodox answers in matters of faith. Experience indicated, however, that this sort of procedure was not enough since many continued to profess heretical opinions.⁴ In 1554 and 1558 other cases were formed on the same style as that of 1546, mainly against persons absent from Malta. The names of these individuals were in fact to appear often before the Bishop himself or his successors and most of them were eventually condemned for heresy.

This index does not include the records of the Commission appointed by Grand Master D'Homedes in 1553 to take action in cases concerning the faith of members of the Order.⁵ This lacuna could indicate that the records of the Grand Master's Commission were never incorporated in the Archives of the Inquisition.

Bishop Cubelles as Pro-Inquisitor: 1562 – 66

Cubelles received powers to act as Inquisitor in a Brief dated 21 October 1561 and published in Malta on 15 July 1562.⁶ The Bishop now began to call himself Inquisitor and was furnished with his own Camera Secreta, separate prisons, and staff.⁷

The new Tribunal held its first session on 14 August 1562⁸ and the first accusation was heard on the 17th.⁹ It was only in May/June 1563, however, that the Tribunal began to function fully. By that time many had begun to appeal before it to declare their faults spontaneously. The great number of cases of this period show the immediate success of the Tribunal in its mission.¹⁰ In fact, things were going well with the Holy Office especially since Cubelles was assisted by Fra Tommaso de Vio of Gaeta who came purposely from Rome to help in the re-organization. Fra Tommaso became so important that the Bishop would not act without his advice. Salviati points out that things were going so well that the Holy Office might have succeeded in extirpating heresy from Malta had it not been for the Turkish invasion of 1565. The Great Siege, and the eventual death of Cubelles a year later, interrupted the functions of the Tribunal. As the Turkish fleet was nearing Malta in May 1565, Fra Tommaso left the island, and the Bishop took the radical measure of winding up the Holy Office and dismissing its officers.¹¹

It is evident that between 1562 and 1565 the cases heard by the Inquisition were greater in number and more varied in nature than before. The first case on record, that of 1546, was against twenty-eight persons all accused of 'heresy' under one form or another. These included eleven who were accused of reading prohibited books and twelve who did not abstain from food forbidden by the Church on established days. Two others were accused of sorcery, one of blasphemy, and another had allegedly favoured the marriage of priests.¹²

A year later (1547) four persons were accused of reading prohibited books, including Don Andrea Axac, rector of the school of Mdina. Axac had already been charged before Cubelles the previous year; the case of 1547 is included with one of 1563.¹³ In fact, Salviati states that after 1546 other processes were formed on the same pattern for 1554 and 1558.¹⁴ In 1554 only one person was accused of heresy, while in 1557 ten persons appeared before the Bishop similarly accused and a Sicilian of Vittoriosa was denounced for having robbed the church of St Agatha at Mdina. These cases were later appended to a case of 1563 and came to be considered part of it.

Only 2 cases arose in 1558, both accused presumably being Greek.¹⁵ The only document that figures for 1559 is a cedula drawn on behalf of Don

Joseph Bellia of Birkirkara in which he demanded from Antonio Camenzuli, a Monitorio of the Bishop's court, 50 scudi that he had given to his sister Laurica Sammut.¹⁶ In 1561 only two cases were heard by Cubelles, one involving a nun at St Scholastica and the Magnifico Pietro De Nava accused of illicit relations¹⁷ and in the other Pietro Cumbo was accused by heresy.¹⁸ There remain two other undated cases which may belong to the period prior to Cubelles' appointment as Pro-Inquisitor. These two cases, numbered 2 and 3 in vol. 1, also deal with heretical practices of two Maltese Franciscan friars.¹⁹ It can, therefore, be concluded that most cases from the time of Cubelles concerned accusations of heretical practices. The 1562 establishment of the Holy Office as a separate Tribunal changed the whole situation. There is only one case for 1562²⁰ while there are 28 cases for 1563, five of which concerned more than one person, an increase that explains why the Tribunal was so busy before the Siege. One particular case against eleven persons accused of heretical practices was heard in June 1563.²¹

The majority of cases between 1561 and 1565 dealt with heresy in all its various forms with more than forty-six individuals accused of such 'crimes' as reading prohibited literature (15); sorcery (9); breaking of abstinence (5); bigamy (3); apostasy (2); blasphemy (2); and a case of concubinage, besides 3 petitions.

Six cases were dealt with in 1564. This number is insignificant when compared to that of the previous year and that of the first six months of 1565. In 1565 fourteen cases were heard; all, except two, appeared prior to 18 May. The latter two cases were not heard before Cubelles as Inquisitor but rather in his capacity as Bishop since by then the Holy Office had closed down.

There is also a copy of the abjuration of Don Andrea Axac, master of the Grammar School at Mdina. His final trial was held in Rome in front of the Inquisitor General, Mastro Thommaso Scoto. Axac was declared a heretic and was given a sentence (see Index and AIM Proc. Crim. Vol. 4A, case 27, ff. 204 – 208v, dated March 1562).

By 1563, as soon as the Holy Office was established under Bishop Cubelles, most of Axac's followers were to be processed. No wonder that Mgr. Salviati, writing in 1759, readily mentions the immediate success of the newly set up Tribunal in the extirpation of heresy. (AIM, Mem. Salviati, f.22v.)

21. Ibid.

In fact, during the Great Siege there was no Inquisitor in Malta. The Memoirs of Mgr. Salviati illustrate how the Siege and the closing down of the Holy Office undid most of the work already achieved by the Tribunal.²²

With the death of Cubelles a year after the Siege – on 11 November 1566²³ – started a period of sede vacante for the bishopric of Malta, which lasted till 1572 when Bishop Martino Royas was nominated. In the interval a vicar general or a group of canons administered the diocese.

Sede Vacante – 1566 – 72

The years 1566–72 can rightly be termed a period of transition for both the Holy Office and the diocese of Malta. During this period very few cases related to the Inquisition were brought before the vicar. It is even probable that the judge of the Bishop's Court acted as judge of the Holy Office and eventually cases that were related to the Inquisition were transferred to the Holy Office. This period was particularly hectic for Maltese history for the knights, backed by the Catholic powers, were anxious to see the island better fortified.²⁴

During the six years of sede vacante fourteen Cathedral canons shared the running of the diocese of Malta. It seems that all, or most, of the canons participated in this interregnum, although only two of them exercised power for a long period of time. The Archdeacon, Don Pancratio Michallef, was Capitular Vicar from 26 November 1566 to 15 June 1569, followed later by Don Antonio Bartolo, Parish Priest of Zurrieq, from December 1569 to 1572, the year of Royas' installation.²⁵ Bartolo was one of the prominent personalities in Malta, and he was later to accompany Mgr. Pietro Dusina in his diocesan visitation as Vicar General of the Diocese, the other co-visitor being the Dominican Fra Damiano Taliana who had also had a hand in the affairs of the Holy Office.²⁶ paid a pension of 400 scudi a year to the Prior of the Conventual Church, Fra Antonio Cressino.²⁷ His election was, however, confirmed in May 1572, when Gregory XIII was elected Pope.²⁸ The new Bishop arrived in Malta in January 1573 with a Papal Brief appointing him Inquisitor as well.

From February 1573 to July 1574, during Royas' term of office as Inquisitor, fourteen cases were heard, of which one included eight persons and another, four. On his return to Malta, however, the first person Royas dealt with was his old friend, Dottor Antonio Bonello, who had been condemned by his antagonist, Fra Tommaso de Vio, under Bishop Cubelles. Bonello, together with many knights, had been accused of heresy.²⁹ Royas was later to deal with the knights suspected of heretical practices which eventually led to his losing the inquisitorship. In 1573 only two cases were heard before Royas, both dealing with heresy, the other cases being heard in the first half of 1574. During Royas' short term of office as Inquisitor the people accused before the Holy Office came from all strata of society. The accused involved lawyers, notaries, knights, clerics, tavern keepers, workers, sailors, and medical doctors. As Inquisitor, Royas' position differed from that of Cubelles, whose problem had not been with the people of his diocese but with the Order to which, like Royas, he belonged. The problem of proceeding against knights became acute and led to trouble during his administration, except that Royas' position vis-à-vis the Order did not suffer. Cubelles would only proceed against knights with the acquiescence of the Grand Master and the higher officials of the Order itself.

Royas' position differed as Gregory XIII's Brief granted him full authority as inquisitor. However, it did not take long for trouble to ensue. He soon accused Grand Master La Cassiere of trying to destroy his episcopal authority. La Cassiere reacted by requesting Rome to send an ecclesiastical delegate to look into the matter. Rome sent Mgr. Pietro Dusina whose mission was to acquaint himself with the difficulties between the Bishop and the Grand Master and to act as Inquisitor and Apostolic Delegate.³⁰

Delegate with a Brief dated 3 July 1574,³¹ which was to serve as a model for later Briefs. A copy was also sent to Royas in his capacity as Bishop of Malta.³²

Dusina was granted the faculty to proceed alone in all cases dealing with the Faith, including those in which knights were involved. Dusina acted in concert with Royas as both of them signed their names on decrees and sentences,³³ and he even gave precedence to the Bishop in certain cases.³⁴

Dusina's term of office lasted from 25 August 1574 to the end of May 1575. In these nine months, twenty-five cases were brought before him.³⁵ Dusina's term of office is of particular interest especially since he was the first Inquisitor of Malta to be sent specifically and directly from Rome and it resulted in a gradual increase of authority of the Holy Office. Upon Dusina's arrival the number of cases increased considerably with as many as fifteen people being accused of heresy during his short period of tenure. Amongst these one finds important citizens including the judge Dottor Ludovico Platomone³⁶ on 21 September 1574 and Don Pancratio Michallef, Archdeacon of the Cathedral, who in November of that year was found guilty of conversing with heretics and was sentenced to preach against them in sermons at the Cathedral.³⁷

A factor which led to the increased efficiency in the functioning of the Tribunal must surely have been the short terms of office of the inquisitors. Dusina himself spent only nine months in Malta, in which period he could not have made many friends and could, therefore, be expected to show impartiality in his decisions.

In fact, the coming of Dusina stands out as a landmark in Maltese history since the role of the Church became much more stressed in the centuries that followed. By the late sixteenth century, religion developed into one of the major characteristics of the Maltese ethnic identity. Above all, this attempt on the role of the Church was particularly dear to the Maltese élite since it helped to define Maltese society within a definite European context – a fact which made them acceptable by the dominant culture of the times.
