

MALTA AND DUBROVNIK TOWARDS THE YEAR 1380¹

by

Anthony Luttrell

During the later middle ages Malta lay on none of the great trade routes. Venetian shipping bound for the Western Mediterranean or even Tunis normally passed along the northern shores of Sicily, while Genoese, Catalan and other Western vessels making for Syria and Egypt sailed by way of Southern Greece, Rhodes or Cyprus. The only long-distance route which regularly brought ships to Malta was that to Tripoli.² Malta formed part of the Kingdom of Sicily and lay marginally within the loose economic unity dominated by the Crown of Aragon, which included Sicily, Sardinia and the Balearics, as well as the mainland territories of Catalunya, Valencia and Aragon proper;³ and by the 1370s the Catalans were increasingly penetrating the Adriatic in search of the timber they needed from Senj and other Dalmatian ports.⁴

The ships and merchants of the lesser mercantile centres also visited Malta from time to time. In the case of Dubrovnik, whose merchants exported Dalmatian wood and the gold and silver of Bosnia and Serbia, its foreign trade expanded greatly after it became politically and commercially independent of Venice in 1358. In the following decades Dubrovnik merchants were active in the Levant and even, occasionally, in North Africa.⁵ Dubrovnik naturally traded across the Adriatic,⁶ and at times was also

1. This is based on only a brief exploration in the Dubrovnik State Archives, largely following indications in B. KREKIC, Dubrovnik (Raguse) et le Levant au Moyen Age (Paris-The Hague, 1961), and publishing three texts, two of them calendared in KREKIC, 217, 223. Useful descriptions of the archives are in KREKIC, 161-165, and J. TADIC, "Les sources de l'histoire maritime yougoslave", Les sources de l'histoire maritime en Europe, du moyen âge au XVIIIe siècle, ed. M. MOLLAT (Paris, 1962). Note: Dubrovnik, the medieval Ragusa, is easily confused with the Sicilian port in close contact with Malta; the Melita of the Dubrovnik documents is a Dalmatian Island; the de Goze is a Dubrovnik family.

 5. The process is studied in KREKIC; apart from Documents I and III below, the evidence for North Africa is only slight (e.g. ibid., 25, 78, 104 n. 1, 173, 273, 355, 407).

anxious to maintain friendly contacts with Sicily in order to ensure its wheat supply. When a vessel from Zara captured a Sicilian ship in mid-1380 and unloaded its goods at Dubrovnik, the authorities at Dubrovnik instructed their envoys at Zara to protest and to point out not only that their wheat supply had been endangered but that the Sicilians were the friends of their overlord, the King of Hungary. These instructions dated 25 June 1380, revealed that the Sicilian vessel carried goods loaded by certain Jews from Malta:

Et anchora l'altro di uegnando uno nauilio di Siciliani uno brigantino de zara delo qual e patron damiano Stoyanouich prese lo dicto nauilio in mar et meno lo dicto nauilio cargado di mercadantie di Sicilianj et di zudei che habita in la malta a raguxa li quali son amisi del nostro signor, et⁷ et nostri, et le cosse deli Sicilianj rendereno ali Sicilianj et le cosse deli zudei tolse, la qual cosa poria tornar in grando dampno a noy per che el ne conven andar in la Sicilia per mercadantie et per blaua la qual noy usemo a comprare in la Sicilia dando ne caxon che zaratini, et noy ragusinj semo subiecti ad uno signor.⁸

Not only were Maltese merchants sending goods into the Adriatic, but one was there in person. On 20 July 1380 the Council at Dubrovnik exempted Bonfiglio de Malta, captain of a ship then at Dubrovnik, from the gabella on goods he imported into and exported from Dubrovnik, on condition that by May 1381 he produced letters from his domini, that is from the comunitas of Malta and from Manfredo Chiaramonte who was one of the four vicari or regents of Sicily,⁹ granting Dubrovnik merchants similar exemptions at Malta. He was to leave pledges for his fulfilment of these conditions, and if he did not send the letters he was to pay three percent on all gods brought into or taken out of Dubrovnik.¹⁰

This proposal for a trade agreement apparently came to nothing,¹¹ but Dubrovnik merchants did visit Malta at this time. In 1377 Joanna, wife of Tomchus Bogdanich of the Dalmation island of Kolocep won a case against Milos Gugnevich who on 4 August 1376 had contracted with Tomchus and a certain Philipo Samo of Genoa to go to Senj, to collect a cargo of timber and to take it to Tripoli. Instead Milos had sold the wood in Malta and as a result Tomchus had been thrown into prison in Tripoli. Milos claimed that on reaching Malta he had heard that Tripoli was being besieged and that it was unsafe to go there, and that in any case the Maltese had forcibly seized the timber. After examining the evidence, which included various testimonies which Milos had secured from Malta, the court was found against Milos and ordered him to go to Senj, load the timber and carry it to Tripoli as originally agreed.¹²

Milos Gugnevich appears to have returned to Malta and to have made more trouble there, for in May 1382 he was calling witnesses in Dubrovnik to prove that he had carried a quantity of cotton to Tripoli on behalf of an anonymous Jew at Malta. In Tripoli he claimed to have received quantities of oil and material; on account of bad seas, Milos was — he claimed — unable to take these to Malta but instead he apparently sold part of the material in Sicily and some oil in Cephalonia, and took the rest to Dubrovnik. He claimed to have paid the Jew pecias iij lencij and four ducats worth of figs, but there had clearly been disagreement about this.¹³

These relations between Malta and Dubrovnik seem not to have been sustained, partly perhaps because of the troubled times through which Malta passed at the end of the century.¹⁴ None the less the affairs of Milos Gugnevich of Dubrovnik show that Malta did have a position on the route to Tripoli; and in 1380 there was sufficient contact for the authorities at Dubrovnik to consider a formal trade agreement.

Two documents of 24 January 1409 (Dubrovnik State Archives: Diversa Cancellariae, xxxviii, f. 51v-52, partially calendared in KREKIC, 255-256) mention a Gulielmus de Malta, a merchant then at Dubrovnik, but he was apparently from Sicily, possibly from Siracusa; in any case, he had only arrived at Dubrovnik because of bad weather.
