

1. Burials in Maltese Churches: 1419–1530/40*

The report made in 1575 by Pietro Dusina, the Apostolic Visitor to the Maltese diocese charged with the task of rooting out a number of abuses and defects, might suggest that the private ownership of graves in the Maltese churches, so common a phenomenon until burial in churches was stopped in the course of the last century, had not started before the year 1575. In fact, Dusina reported several times that the dead were buried in earth instead of in proper graves.¹ Even for the cathedral at Mdina he had to leave instructions for this “impiety” to stop.² However ample evidence survives in other sources to show that some graves existed much before 1575 and were also owned privately and used as family graves despite the custom of burial in common earth.

As early as 30 November 1419 the nobleman Antonius de Vagnolo and his wife Ismiralda bought a family grave in the cathedral of Mdina:³

quoddam locum situm et positum in eadem ecclesia sive spatium intus videlicet Tribonam sinistram ex parte septentrionali sub hiis pactis et condicione subiciat quod dicti Jugales possint valeant et debeant absque aliqua condicione hedificare Altarem ibi ad eorum opus et sepolturam eorum facere pro se et suis et ibi etiam sepeliri Juxta domini nostri Jesu Christi mandatum et dispositionem et hoc facto et hedificato gradam ibi inpune. . . . [sic] possint inde hedificato dicto altare cum dicta sepultura includere quemcumque voluerint ad eos expectantem intus dictam gradam

They retained the right to nominate a priest to take charge of the altar and they made an endowment of two tenimenta terrarum in the district of Żejtun called Rachal Bayada (Hal Bajda).

On 17 May 1431 Don Michele de Fabro, a canon of the cathedral, directed in his will that he was to be buried in the church of St. Mark at Rabat, Malta, which he himself had caused to be built, in the place where the corpse of Donnus Salvus de Calabanchio was laid, ubi corpus Donni Salvi de Calabanchio est defunctum; he left an important legacy to the church, which he intended to bequeath to the Dominicans, but he did not specify the manner of construction of the grave.⁴ Other pre-1530 testamentary provisions for burial are similarly vague but there is, however, no doubt that particular graves were frequently intended and understood. Thus in about 1431 the Sicilian official Andrea de Ravello had his first wife buried in the grave "of" an altar in the cathedral situated on the right side of the main altar, an altar of which he was the "benefactor".⁵ After Ravello's departure from Malta, the altar and its grave were held by Nicolaus de Sarlo who organised the church services there, especially the saying of mass on Thursdays and Saturdays and the celebration of the feast of the Nativity of Our Lady in September. Both of de Sarlo's wives and their children were buried in this grave and eventually he himself was also laid to rest "in the grave of the said altar". Court witnesses in 1491 could not tell how he had acquired his rights over the altar and its grave. His son Antonio then claimed that he had been asked by Johannes de Guyvara to surrender his rights to the altar and grave, rights which he had acquired by inheritance from his late father, on the grounds that, as a resident of Licata in Sicily, he did not need or could not exercise them. Possibly a similar transaction had taken place between Andrea de Ravello and Nicolaus de Sarlo some sixty years before.

Johannes de Nava, Castellan and one of the leading inhabitants of Malta, left instructions in his will of 1487 that he was to be dressed in the habit of St. Francis and buried in the burial place or sepultura belonging to the late Petrus de Busco where the latter had been buried; a marble sepultura was to be made for him within a year by his heir to be marked by a sword, gold-plated daggers and spurs together with a silk banner containing his coat-of-arms.⁶ It is clear that at least the upper classes had properly designed graves owned by themselves or their families.

However, evidence survives to show that by the opening years of the sixteenth century at latest members of the lower classes also aspired to and sometimes obtained family graves of their own. Thus on 9 November 1500 Johannes Vella, the parish priest of Żebbuġ, with the approval of the precentor of the cathedral and the vicar of the bishop, granted to Marcus Chantar for himself and his heirs in perpetuity:⁷

quandam sepulturam sive monumentum perpetuum situm et positum intus dictam parrochiale ecclesiam sancti philippi in quo sepulta est socera prefati Marci.

For this concession Marcus Chantar paid a sum of money for the repair of the walls and structure of the whole church:

Pro quaquidem sepultura sive monumento perpetuo dictus dompnus Johannes confessus est habuisse et recepisse a dicto Marco pro reparacione marammatum et fabrice dicte parrochialis ecclesie sancti Philippi uncias quatuor pecunie Malte.

On 5 November 1519 Antonius Davula, another parish priest of Żebbuġ, granted a grave to the craftsman Georgius Vassaldus for himself and his heirs in return for his help in the making of a crucifix for the same church.⁸ Other graves were given to Paulus Manjun and Michael Axac in return for their gift of 12 tareni each towards the making of the same crucifix.⁹

Żebbuġ was not the only parish church which granted graves to its parishioners in return for money or other assistance. Reference was made on 18 October 1502 by Raidus Hellul alias Bruri to an altar he had set up in the church of Bir Miftuħ, placing himself and his heirs under the obligation of having a mass said at that altar on the feast of the Assumption, when the celebrant and a number of paupers were to be suitably entertained at his expense, as well as other duties:¹⁰

Quod in die beate virginis videlicet in Assumpcione teneatur et sit obligatus facere celebrare anno quolibet in dicto altari unam missam et invitare celebrantem et aliquos pauperes ad discretionem dicti Petri (Raidus's son). Item teneant incendere lampadem que est ante dictum altarem in vigiliis et diebus sollempnibus: sabbatis et festis preceptis necnon in omnibus festivitatibus et vigiliis virginis Marie prout est expressum in contractu super monumento et obligacione dicti altaris celebrato manu egregii notari Mathei Vassaldo notari puplici in quo monumento sive sepulturo voluit ipse Nardus (ie. Raidus) quod sepeliantur et ea utantur omnes filii sui heredesque eorum in perpetuum.

On 20 August 1502 Antonius de Nicolachi as vice-parish priest of the parish of St. Catherine of Żejtun agreed, with the concurrence of the procurators of the church of St. Mary of Casali Pascualino (Hal Bisqallin), to grant a right of burial to Antonius Randuni alias Rocca, in return for the donation of a field situated in the district of Tal Gwiedi to that church to help pay for its walls and structure:¹¹ et in cambium dicte clausure consignavit prefato Antonio (Randuni) presenti et a dicto dompnō Antonio tamquam vice capellano ut supra recipienti pro se suisque heredibus et successoribus in perpetuum unam sepulturam perpetuam intus dictam ecclesiam sancte Marie casalis Pascualini . . .

The field was sold on the same day by Nicholachi and the two procurators of the church to Nicolaus Cassar of the same village, who already owned land adjoining the field on its eastern side and who paid two uncie for it, pro fabrica et marammatibus fiendis in dicta ecclesia.¹²

Zurrieq itself provides three early sixteenth-century examples of privately owned graves. On 30 April 1506 Guaglarda, the widow of Dionisius Manjuni, with the approval of her two sons Michael and Georgius, gave to Petrus Hellul, the parish priest of Sancta Catherina de lu Zurrico, a field situated in the district of Tal-Bitti retaining for herself a small portion, just enough to sow two mundella of wheat. About seven years later the same craftsman Michael Manjuni seems to have obtained another grave for himself and his descendants from the same parish priest in return for adding an extra bay to the same church:¹⁴

At Birkirkara in 1538 a dispute broke out between Johannes Pisano, the parish priest, and one of his parishioners over the ownership of family graves.¹⁶ Pisano held that:¹⁷

de usu et antiquissima observancia dicte ecclesie parochialis di Bircarcaria et ab antiquissimo tempore a quo non est memoria in contrarium fuit et est observatum che quando alcuna persuna voli haviri alcuna sepultura in dicta ecclesia oy vero in lo cymiteri non altromenti si chi po conchediri et darisi dicta sepultura excepto che in recompensa di la dicta sepultura non si dugna alcuna parti di terreno oy vero dinari oy alcuna altra cosa et di quisto modo si solino dari et conchediri sepulturi et non aliter. On the other hand, witnesses stated that Xenno Burg had inherited from his father a grave in the main church always held by the Burg family and another constructed forty-five years previously in the adjoining church of St. Agatha:¹⁸

It would be easy but pointless to give similar references to family graves in other churches.²¹ The evidence given is enough to suggest that Dusina needs careful reinterpretation in the light of the new information. It is clear that family graves already existed in Malta a century and a half before his time and that by the beginning of the sixteenth century even mere craftsmen and other villagers aspired to and obtained family graves. Proprietors of chapels or churches would no doubt have pride of place but other benefactors and mere procurators, apparently, also managed to get hold of a grave. Incidentally, one cannot help noticing the surprising amount of church or chapel building, rebuilding or extending that was taking place throughout this time.²²
